Work being done to reduce traffic delays

Engineers are continuing to try to ensure that traffic flows more freely over the controversial new Civic Drive junction that opened at the end of June.

The junction replaced the Greyfriars roundabout as part of the Travel Ipswich programme.

Some drivers have complained about delays since the traffic lights were turned on, but engineers are still working out the optimal speed for the lights to change to allow vehicles to move more smoothly.

And the computer-controlled system that will link the Civic Drive junction lights with those on Greyfriars Street and at the junction with Wolsey Street is due to come online later this year. Engineers are convinced these changes will help the traffic flow better – but insist they remain happy about the way drivers have responded to the new junction even before the final adjustments are made.

The computer system will also be linked to lights going along Star Lane, Fore Street, Fore Hamlet and Bishop's Hill, which should speed traffic across the town.

Graham Newman, Suffolk County Council's cabinet member for transport, said: "Our engineers are currently assessing traffic flows and pedestrian movements and because of the technology being installed, are easily able to make changes that optimise the junction for everyone."
